Sampling Design for Survey of Enterprises in the Philippines

School of Statistics Auditorium
4 p.m.

The colloquium presents the paper of Dr. Erniel Barrios on business surveys.

Business surveys, according to Barrios's study, are very challenging for two reasons: the organizational structures of businesses are too complicated, thus it is often difficult to locate where the data is; and the distribution of some target variables like revenue is not normal but rather severely skewed.

The problem of enumerating a firm with complicated organizational structure is addressed by considering an enterprise instead of establishments. Most firms adopt aggregated financial reporting system. Hence, by enumerating only the head office, all branches, subsidiaries and other firm affiliates can possibly be accounted properly. This will minimize the bias that could be easily accrued due to coverage problem of establishment-based surveys. This will also minimize the possible item response error for certain indicators that are not necessarily available at the establishment level but are compiled only at the head office.

For more information, please call 928-0881 or 981-8500 loc. 3503.

Dr. Barrios is a professor and former dean of the School of Statistics, UP Diliman.

Indirect Fertility Estimation in light of International Labor Migration: Differentials across Selected Variables

School of Statistics Auditorium
4 p.m.

The colloquium presents the study of Michael Dominique del Mundo on the relationship of Migration and Fertility in the Philippines by focusing on the effect of spousal separation due to international labor migration on fertility.

The 2010 Census on Population and Housing data was used and the Brass P/F ratio method was utilized to estimate Total Fertility Rates (TFR) at the national and regional levels controlling for education and socio-economic status. Pooled Ordinary Least-Squares (OLS) regression was used to estimate the effect of spousal separation on fertility. Findings of the study reveal that Filipino women on the average give birth to approximately three children during their entire reproductive years. TFR estimates were low for women who have at least college education and who were classified in the higher wealth quintiles.

For more information, please call 928-0881 or 981-8500 loc. 3503.

Del Mundo is Instructor at the School of Statistics, UP Diliman. The paper is part of his thesis in the Master of Arts in Demography.

The Link between Expenditure on Contraceptives and Number of Young Dependents in the Philippines

Lucagbo is Assistant Professor at the School of Statistics, UP Diliman.

School of Statistics Auditorium
4 p.m.

Prof. Michael Daniel Lucagbo used the Family Income and Expenditure Survey (FIES) 2009 data to examine the factors affecting the number of young dependents in a household, and focuses in particular on the household's level of contraceptive expenditure.

The negative binomial regression model is used to quantify the effect of the factors and predict the average number of young dependents in a household. This model allows for over-dispersion in the data. Results show that for every P10,000 increase in total expenditure on contraceptives for a period of six months, the mean number of young dependents decreases by 3.7 percent. Other demographic variables such as education of household head and income of the household are controlled for in the study.

Constructing Leading Economic Indicators for the Philippine Economy Using Dynamic Factor Models

Albis is Assistant Professor and the Director for Statistical Computing at the School of Statistics, UP Diliman.

School of Statistics Auditorium
4 p.m.

The study presents an alternative, and perhaps better, procedure to the Leading Economic Indicators System (LEIS) in nowcasting the movements of the Gross Domestic Product (GDP) using the Dynamic Factor Models (DFM). This paper used 30 monthly economic indicators in capturing a common factor to nowcast movements of GDP via the DFM.

The DFM is a commonly used data reduction procedure that assumes economic shocks driving economic activity arise from unobserved components or factors. The DFM aims to parsimoniously summarize information from a large number of economic series to a small number of unobserved factors. The DFM assumes that co-movements of economic series can be captured using these unobserved common factors.

In addition to the DFM, the paper also constructed a 2-stage dynamic factor models using Principal Components.

Demographic Sweet Spot and Dividend in the Philippines: The Window of Opportunity is Closing Fast

School of Statistics Auditorium
4 p.m.

Dr. Dennis S. Mapa's paper looks at the population structure of the country from 2010 to 2100, using actual census data from the Philippine Statistics Authority (PSA) and projections on future population from the United Nations (UN), to estimate the period when the country will experience the demographic window of opportunity.

The paper will show that at current conditions (baseline scenario), there is a high probability that the country will entirely miss this rare opportunity of additional economic growth, over a long period of time, due to the demographic dividend. This is primarily due to the challenges related to the relatively high fertility rates, particularly among the poorest households, and the relatively high unemployment rate, particularly among the youth population. The paper will then provide counterfactual conditions, from the results of the econometric models, and simulate alternative scenarios resulting from fine-tuning certain policy handles.

For more information, please call 928-0881 or 981-8500 loc. 3503.
